The study of terrestrial magnetism was receiving world-wide attention in the early part of the 19th century, and in 1838 the British Association for the Advancement of Science brought to the attention of the Government the desirability of obtaining a series of simultaneous magnetic observations at various points in the British colonies. The recommendations of Baron von Humboldt of Germany, Major Edward Sabine, the President of the Royal Society, and the Committee of the British Association were adopted by the Government and four expeditions were sent out in 1839.

The localities chosen by Sabine for the proposed stations were Canada, van Diemen Island, St. Helena and the Cape of Good Hope. The expedition to van Diemen Island was conducted by the British Admiralty and the other three were under the Ordnance Department, the duties to be performed by officers and soldiers of the Royal Artillery. It was suggested that the observations at these stations should include meteorological as well as magnetic phenomena.

Riddell felt that the presence of magnetic rock in the vicinity of Montreal made it an undesirable location for a magnetic observatory. He obtained permission to choose a suitable site at Toronto instead, and observations were begun in an unused barracks of Old Fort York on Christmas Day, 1839. A grant of land was obtained from King's College (now the University of Toronto) in 1840 in order that the Observatory might be established in appropriate scientific surroundings and the Meteorological Service has been closely affiliated with this University ever since. A complete set of meteorological instruments was installed, including a barometer which remained
